INTRODUCTION
This conference focuses on the development of a science-based conservation practice and the emergence of art history as a ‘science of art’ (or Kunstwissenschaft) in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries (1850-1950). New approaches were developed to address technological aspects of ancient artefacts and Renaissance art works based on philological and chemical research that complemented and challenged traditions of connoisseurship. Grounding the technical analyses of art works within scholarship of historical source texts and scientific analyses went hand in hand with attempts to claim a position for art history within the emerging disciplinary landscape of university taught sciences (Wissenschaften). In addition, new editorial series and journals appeared that were devoted to past and present technologies in the arts or to art technological source research (e.g. Technische Mitteilungen, Wiener Quellenschriften). Assessments were conducted by committees whose members represented diverse and changing fields of expertise, including artists, chemists, collectors, museum professionals and administrators, while collaborations between conservators and chemists also helped in the decision-making process for the conservation treatments of deteriorated objects. The establishment of museum laboratories in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries had an influence in the professionalization of conservation as a discipline. How was knowledge in conservation transmitted? How did developments in science and technology impact teaching in art history and conservation? And which scientific methods were used for the study and teaching of art history? This conference investigates emerging cultures of expertise in the period between 1850 and 1950 and the collaborations and conflicts between conservators, chemists and art historians, to understand who was considered an expert in the arts, and for which reasons. It sheds new light onto the disciplinary formation of art history and the professionalization of conservation.

Parallel thematic sessions

14:00 – 15:30  Option 1 – Esther van Duijn, Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam:
Participants can visit the paintings conservation studio of the Rijksmuseum to look at examples of the different sources that can be used for the study of conservation history.

Option 2 – Birgit Reissland, The Netherlands Cultural Heritage Agency:
Participants can take a closer look at examples of twenty-century paper conservation treatments and examples of degradation phenomena that fueled the debates at the St. Gall conference.

Option 3 – Emilie Froment, University of Amsterdam:
Participants can examine a series of samples presenting reconstructions of various ground types before and after wax-resin impregnation.

Option 4 – Paul van Duin, Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam:
This visit will focus on research into the behavior of wooden panels in furniture and paintings.

15:30 – 17.00  Optional: Grand tour of the conservation laboratories in the Ateliergebouw.
